Roles of women in American society from colonial to present times; attitudes toward women, female sexuality, women’s work, and feminism. (SS)
In modern American novels, narratives of love and desire are, frequently, also narratives of death. In particular, it is often women, regardless of race, class, marital status, or age, who cannot survive these narratives. Thus, American literature, from the late 1800’s into the early 1900’s, becomes a literary graveyard for female characters. The causes of death are varied, but whether she is the victim of a brutal husband or a brutal urban life, of a shocking “accident” or of her own despair, the results are hauntingly consistent. To understand the meaning of such a fatal, even fatalistic, literary trend, this course asks students to “read through” the dead female body as we consider texts written by male and female authors from the periods known as Realism, Naturalism, and Modernism. By exploring these novels’ depictions of their dead women, we will uncover a complex portrait of the sexual and gender politics that inform literature from the late 19th and early 20th centuries. In addition, we will also consider a few exceptions to this trend by examining novels in which women survive the narrative. Together, these texts will allow a nuanced conversation about women, sexuality, love, and modernity. Possible authors include Kate Chopin, Frank Norris, Edith Wharton, Ernest Hemingway, and Zora Neale Hurston. (HU)
